believe this is where the magic can happen. I think the biggest geniuses raise the most questions both to themselves and what they perceive from the outside; they allow themselves to not know in order to expand. I think it is good for you to allow yourself to be in that vulnerable place of not knowing and accept all that comes with it, plunging into the search fully is what you do by nature I feel but don't judge yourself for doubts or certain states it rises in you. I will never judge you for not knowing, or seeing or being lost, this is normal and human. Things take time to fall into place and some fall into place faster than others, the only requirement for this is your commitment, openness and willingness to look at things upside down; because I believe that this place of being upside down is where we are not that often and therefore it is the place where probably the biggest challenges and questions are hidden; the place that forces you to expand your vision from what you know to look into what you don't know yet, to learn. For me being part of this process it is easier to see certain things because I have more distance and I believe it is my responsibility to not only share these observations with you but also wait for the right moments to open up these Pandora's boxes. As I said things will fall into place but the right timing and therefore patience in this process is crucial I believe. With standing still there comes a lot of need for patience and trust in the nature of the process. This does not mean to lay back and do nothing but yes let things happen and form itself by all the dialogue we're having and search that we're doing. Trust and let go a bit of the strong urge you feel to keep everything in control, by giving away a part of this responsibility I think it will naturally
