

Secrets of the Molemen - the unlikely and surprising story that you won't believe even after you've read it - and it's true!

BUT FIRST, AN AD:

Tired of noisy footsteps? TRY our new SILENT SOCKS®

Just like regular socks, but with a different name!

They made a journey deep within the interior of the Earth - and you WOULD NOT believe what they found! Well, if you read the headline you might have a hunch. Still. Read on to find out the exciting conclusion to the story! There may be a few advertisements along the way. Just ignore them by clicking randomly with your mouse. Never mind the pop-ups - they are just bonus content!

A month ago, five men emerged from the underground with an amazing tale to tell. They had stories about mysterious creatures that live far below the surface of the earth, an enormous underground civilization of mole-men and -women that threatens to undermine (literally) the very foundations of our human society. But since the day of their return the group have remained silent. They have not appeared in public, and rumors are spreading that the men are being silenced by unknown forces, possibly within our own government.

Read the nail-biting continuation of the story after ingesting some information from our dear sponsors!

...BUT NEW!

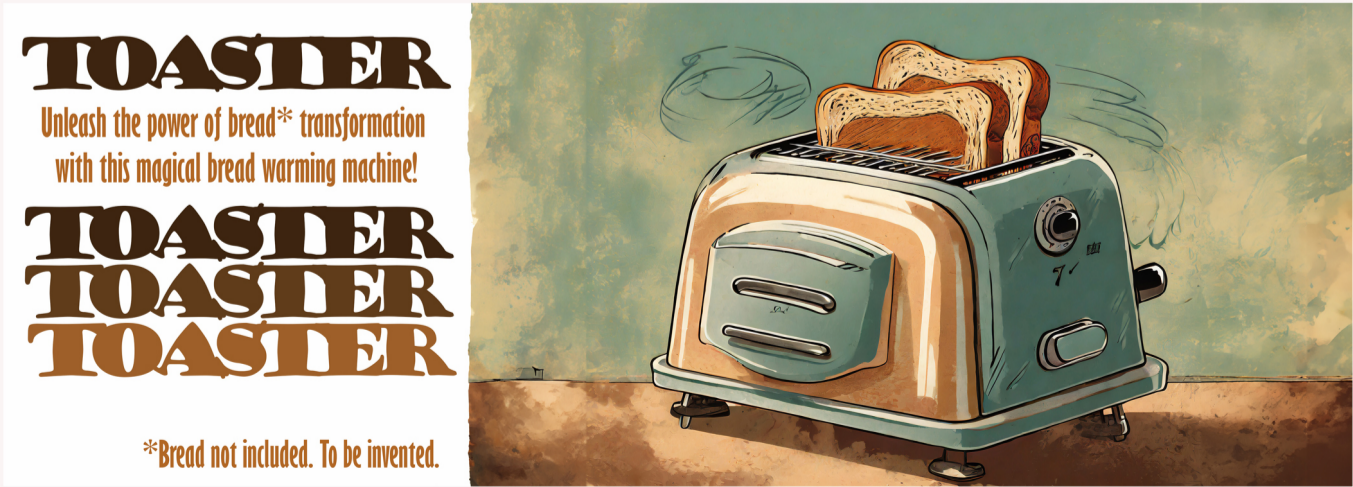

Professor D. Brown is an experimental cloud physicist and inventor of the rainbow harvester, a contraption designed to extract pure pigments from rainbows at the moment they appear in the sky. The exact details of that machine are not known due to a prolonged process of establishing patent rights for it, a process that has kept the professor busy for the last 47 years. But not so busy as to interfere with other inventions forming in his mind! The latest one is a vehicle that manages to drill its way through all the materials that make up the Earth's crust, further down through the magmatic layers and even beyond that, in search of the elusive metallic core. Once located, whoever finds the core will be able to wield powers beyond human imagination and become the ruler of the known universe.

More to come! Just a few more ads. Don't give up just yet!

The idea for the vehicle came from the professor, but the actual construction of it was carried out by a Mr Lemuel, a gardener and an author of several books on plant cultivation and beekeeping. Working from a simple outline sketch that the professor had produced on a paper napkin, Mr Lemuel was able to work out not only the details of the design of the craft, but also invent a new and supremely strong metal alloy that is able to withstand any known material likely to come their way in the ground including the intense heat from the molten magma inside the Earth. The propulsion system was also dreamt up by Mr Lemuel, but we will not make any effort to describe it here. We don't understand any of it, and neither will the reader.

Another break - sorry! We don't work for free. Well, basically we do, but the owners want to make a pretty penny off our backs, so here goes: another bunch of ads!

Those were ads. Back to the story!

The expedition disappeared into the ground a month ago. On their return the members appeared confused and disoriented, and spoke incoherently of giant moles and underground cathedrals, before being carried off by agents disguised as medical professionals. Since then not a word has been heard from them, and rumors are now spreading about a conspiracy involving forces within our country's leadership, possibly in cahoots with the subterranean shadow government led by the nefarious queen of the mole people.

That was it. Want to read more? Here are some ads!
