

- We haven't worked with what the physical impulses are in relation to others. When we coexist / are in joined relationship is there something that might drive them toward one another. Is it consciously dipping on to someone? Is it something about the consciousness that informs the going toward? And how does the other react? Do they stay in their own being or do they yield and how much?
 - What's the form of the body? Can we add form, for whatever the might mean in this context? Perhaps the consciousness / responsiveness might create a form.
 - Dramaturgically, a great big mass event (like Covid-19) can be a container for the individuals to weave in and out of. The container isn't the sensation, but a collective event which everybody can relate to and have an individual experience of in a way as well. Space, time, loss, health, isolation, disorientation, large world shift...
- END of COFFEE TALK —

Checking in with everyone + talk

Yesterday was a bit more passive encounters, but what about the physical impulses that drive the action toward others / one's surroundings? Maybe there's a specific action that drives us toward another. What is the memory / sensation / thing we are working with contributing to how we relate. And once you are handling what is the new sensation / information that comes from them. This new info might cut through and drive you away, but might also make you stay with it, with another layer.

What happens to the person you meet? Do they yield or support or resist?

— END of TALK + CHECK IN —

- Who are you today?
- Take your time, pick or receive a memory, sense it, find the feedback + language of it. Take the time, we'll do it together.